

B3 SA - BRASIL BOLSA BALCAO BOLSY

August 25, 2025 - 1:04am EST

by

hkup881

2025 2026

Price:	12.56	EPS	0	0
Shares Out. (in M):	5,198	P/E	0	0
Market Cap (in $M):	65,287	P/FCF	0	0
Net Debt (in $M):	0	EBIT	0	0
TEV (in $M):	0	TEV/EBIT	0	0

Description

Nothing in this post should be construed as a recommendation to purchase any investments and nothing should be interpreted as investment advice of any kind. Additionally, no representation or warranty is made or can be given with respect to the accuracy or completeness of the information.

The Brazilian Bovespa has been in a bear market (in USD terms) since the summer of 2008, or since Eike Batista threatened to become the richest person in the world.

This two-decade bear market is partly due to Brazil having 2 national pastimes; Presidential corruption and Socialist politics (ironically, futebol ranks a distant #3). Then again, as a Brazilian friend always reminds me, "Brazil is never as bad as it seems, and it's never as good as it could be." Brazil will always be the country of the future.

However, Brazil may be entering an up-cycle because on October 4th, 2026, Brazilians will be voting for President, and there's a good chance that the Commie Hobbit (Lula) will leave politics for good. This will happen at the same time that Trump is perusing policies that will weaken the US Dollar (a weak Dollar is a huge tailwind for a commodity exporting EM). If these two trends coalesce, you could see a major bull market in the Bovespa.

To start with, since Milei started cleaning up Argentina, he's become the most popular politician in Latin America, second only to Bukele who is cleaning up El Salvador. Voters in Latin America increasingly want young, energetic Presidents who actually accomplish impossible tasks. At the same time, they're turning away from Socialism after seeing it fail (yet again).

This is continent-wide. In the upcoming Bolivian election, the Socialists didn't even get a candidate into round 2. It's center-right vs further right. In Chile, the Milei clone is far ahead. Peru's Socialists have single-digit approval ratings. Colombia also looks to swing right as Petro is rather unpopular. However, the largest country in South America is Brazil, and if regional trends hold, Brazil will also swing to the right.

Despite notoriously inaccurate polling statistics in Brazil, Lula is clearly polling poorly on approval ratings (there is no opposition candidate yet). Even a short-term pop from the 50% Trump tariffs, couldn't prop up his approval ratings for more than a few weeks. They're once again sliding. While it's impossible to know who he'll run against, I think there's a good chance that the leading Brazilian oligarchs will choose someone who can do the Milei thing and fix the economy.

Honestly, the economy is easy to fix. The core issue is that Lula has scared FDI out of the country, so that the Brazilian Real or BRL or R$, keeps leaking, unless the Central Bank gives depositors a HSD real yield. Obviously, that real yield is stifling for the economy, and it's staying in place, even as inflation comes down, because they want to support the FX. Lula may not be very smart, or good at economics, but he knows that R$ 6 is the magic line for his voters, and he's willing to suffer a recession, rather than a 6-handle.

Obviously, someone that appeals to FDI, will solve this rather fast, and it will be reflexive as the Central Bank can lower rates, allowing companies to borrow and invest in the economy. Especially at a time when countries like China are sick of Trump, and would much rather buy their soybeans, beef and other commodities from Brazil, than USA, while Trump is trying to take the USD lower, taking further pressure off the BRL. Finally, as South America turns to the right politically, the whole trading region should prosper, leading to an increase in economic activity for everyone.

In summary, with the right adult supervision in Brazil, this could all get reflexive in a hurry.

So how to play it?? I think B3, the Brazilian stock exchange is an unusually good setup. Let's start with basics. Everyone knows that stock exchanges are amazing businesses, they're asset-light, with great ROIC. They tend to work in inflation and deflation. They simply act as a toll-road. However, when a market has been in a two-decade bear market, they are unusually reflexive. This is because during a bull market, trading volume expands, new listings happen (driving more trading volume), the equity values go up (benefiting someone like B3 that charges bps per trade), people need more data, more hedging, more of everything. The throughput on the toll road expands exponentially, while the costs are rather fixed.

Looking at B3, I've lifted some market data from the most recent corporate deck to show you;

-how under-penetrated the market is in Brazil.

Market Potential

Low participation from the population shows that the Brazilian capitals market can grow significantly

Total Population (million)	67	332	1,412	1,408	208
Number of investors ¹ (million)	27	158	220	160	5
Population in the stock Exchange (%)	40%	48%	16%	11%	2%
Population with bank account (%)	100%	95%	89%	83%	84%

-how small of a percentage cash equities has shrunk to over the years (indicating huge leverage to a recovery)

Diversified Business Model

Despite the still challenging environment for the cash equities market, the Company's total revenue has shown resilient behavior over time, supported by multiple growth drivers

Company's Quarterly Revenue (in R$ million)

-How capital returns have pivoted from dividends to buybacks

Share Buyback Program

Since 2019, the Company has repurchased around 12% of its capital

Shares issued, held in treasury, and canceled (in millions of shares, except the EPS)

Return to Shareholders

(R$ million and % of net income)

Basically, you get the thesis b/c you've interacted with a stock exchange before. This is a business where every vertical is growing, except cash equities. I think that is about to take off, while derivatives/fixed income/securities lending should also grow with interest in the Brazilian market. Meanwhile, the exchange has gotten a lot more aggressive at buybacks, which should increase the upside leverage.

Derivatives, Equities and Fixed Income and Credit

Revenue Breakdown (2024)

What makes this particularly interesting, is that the shares are unusually cheap.

In 2024, the company had after-tax earnings of R$ 4.577 billion, up from R$ 4.132 billion in 2023. Neither was a particularly exemplary year from the perspective of B3 or the Bovespa. Applying this to the 5.198 billion shares outstanding at the end of Q2/25, the company earned 88 cents a share in 2024. Against an August 22, 2025 share price of R$ 12.56, you're looking at a 14.3x earnings multiple. Annualizing the R$ 1.326 billion of Q2/2025 earnings gets you to R$ 5.304 billion of annualized income, or $R 1.02 a share or 12.3x earnings. Of course, it's dangerous to annualize any one quarter as there are always recurring benefits/detractors and B3 has a history of lumpy expense realizations as it upgrades software. However, I think it's safe to say that earnings are clocking in somewhere at 12.3x and 14.3x, and probably on the lower side of that multiple. This is unusually cheap for a global stock exchange, especially one with a lot of upside leverage.

I don't think it's unreasonable to assume that if the 'right guy' wins, you see a doubling of earnings at B3 and a doubling of the multiple to be more inline with global exchange multiples. You also get a few percent shrinkage of the share count while you wait for the election. That would add up to roughly a 4-fold appreciation here.

Of course, there are a lot of investors who missed Argentina. With the right guy in place, capital can flood in and this can really overshoot. There's a case to be made that Brazil is desperately in need of some privatizations (nothing quite gives the potential for corruption like a privatization!!). There is likely a large backlog of companies that would like to get listed, driving more public shares. I can see a lot of reflexive reasons for earnings to more than double—especially as B3 charges bps instead of per share, hence a Bovespa rally gives them even more upside, due to an increase in market cap, when compared to an exchange that charges per share. There's a long history of stock markets in bull market countries, having 10x and 25x returns during very short periods of time as a market booms. That isn't the most likely case here, but you do get a free look at such an outcome.

Naturally, the election can go wrong. But how much worse can things be under Lula (again)??

This seems like one of those where you're risking 10-20% to maybe make a few times your money, and the odds are increasingly tilting towards the latter scenario where Lula is out.

I'm happy to answer any questions you may have in the comments section. Yes, there is a new exchange that is trying to get licensed (it won't go anywhere). Yes, there are strange legacy tax liabilities (B3 keeps winning in court). Yes, there's a legacy lawsuit from the GFC (B3 will almost certainly win). Please ask the questions and I'll do my best to answer. In the end, I want to keep this simple. Cheap stock exchange stock + long-term bear market + election coming up + Trump wants the USD weaker = really fascinating risk/reward. Everything else is noise here...

Ohhh, and 1 last thing. Interactive Brokers and B3 have both confirmed that they're in the final phases of allowing access to the exchange for IB clients. That should add some additional volumes...

I do not hold a position with the issuer such as employment, directorship, or consultancy.
I and/or others I advise hold a material investment in the issuer's securities.

Catalyst

Lula loses/quits/dies

Messages

Subject benchmark yield comparison
Entry 08/25/2025 09:26 AM
Member coffee1029

Thanks for the write-up. I agree with much of what you say.

I like simple, and don't want a macro discussion, but I am surprised that foreigners investing in Brazil often seem to ignore structurally higher local interest rates.

Currently, Brazil monetary policy is 15% and projected to remain high, not 4.33% and expected lower.

Brazilian TIPS yields are 7-8% above inflation across the curve, not the 1-2% in US. Obviously that compounds over decades to very different discount rate.

In that context is 12.3x to 14.3x earnings cheap?

My answer from my experience would be that if past cycles repeat this "does not matter" to stock prices because foreign investors mainly ignore it, instead only getting long Brazil stocks when they want to also be long everything Brazil, including currency (so funding rate is USD), and prefer equities to fixed income. But I am surprised that quality public equities in Brazil rarely seem to get as cheap as the currency and fixed income. Maybe the lack of quality public businesses, or some other reasons which you know, can explain why the Brazilian stock market at or near cyclical lows never seems priced, echoing your friend's comment, "as good as it could be".

Subject Re: benchmark yield comparison
Entry 08/25/2025 10:40 AM
Member hkup881

No arguments from me. All sorts of assets like fixed income are cheap in Brazil. And yes, maybe equities aren't cheap enough in the context of rates. However, with bonds, you get a one and done revaluation. After that, I think capital floods into equities if rates decline. Therefore, equities ought to be a bit more expensive for the optionality, especially names like B3 that earn the effect of a giant asset reallocation from fixed income into equities.

I also think that lower rates can do a lot to spur the real economy and create a reflexive cycle.

Subject XP
Entry 08/27/2025 09:22 AM
Member yellow

Good write up and idea.

How would you rate XP vs B3 to play the same themes?

Aware you talked about XP in the past hence why me asking.

Obrigado

Subject Re: XP
Entry 08/27/2025 02:59 PM
Member hkup881

We're long globs of XP. Think it's the other name to own in Brazil. Bit more complex as the financial side has more moving pieces and more earnings volatility. Probably has a bit more torque as it has a US listing. Its basically the same trade.

I posted on B3 as it's cleaner and the undervaluation vs global comps is more obvious...

Subject Re: Re: benchmark yield comparison
Entry 08/28/2025 10:47 AM
Member beethoven

I actually asked a Brazilian investor this same question - why stocks don't get truly cheap even at major bottoms? Explanation was that a small % of Brazil's GDP is reflected in the stock market. It has just 330 public companies vs. 4,500 in the US. There's always a bid just to have exposure to Brazil which some funds need to have and that prevents wash outs. The thing is you don't get the opposite on the upside, it seems. The small float doesn't result in premium valuations when things are good. A strange market for value investors. My take has been that you can't do what Buffett professed in his early days, which is that you make your return when you buy. In Brazil, you have to make your return when you sell. If you time a commodities boom well, you'll do great. Personally, I've looked at this market a decent amount and always seem to have found better risk/rewards in other markets where you can make your return when you buy.

hkup - enjoyed your write up. Well done. But as always in this market, it seems to be about timing a macro event. But, hey, I'm likely to be the bozo who misses the next boom because "it never got cheap enough" so don't listen to me.

Subject Re: Re: Re: benchmark yield comparison

Entry 08/28/2025 10:56 AM
Member hkup881

12x trough earnings for a stock exchange isn't cheap enough??

I think it depends on how you frame it. Back in 2007, Brazil was crazy expensive. It can swing back there (maybe). But if you look at it through a 2009 and onwards lens, then yes, it never really washed out and never really ran. The multiple just slowly shrank...

Subject Re: Re: Re: Re: benchmark yield comparison
Entry 08/28/2025 12:20 PM
Member beethoven

Two questions: Why has revenue growth been so volatile?

12x is certainly undervalued for this type of business, but want to understand the inflation tailwind. You said they price in bps, and if stocks are a good inflation hedge, is their projected revenue growth of MSD to HSD reflective of inflation? Reason I ask is if inflation drops to zero, would rev growth dry up? Trying to understand real growth, if possible.

Revenue & Profit Estimates Management Estimates Earnings History Debt Summary Dividend Summary

Actuals & Forward Estimates TIKR.com	12/31/16 A	12/31/17 A	12/31/18 A	12/31/19 A	12/31/20 A	12/31/21 A	12/31/22 A	12/31/23 A	12/31/24 A	12/31/25 E	12/31/26 E	12/31/27 E
Revenue	2,320.78	4,006.17	4,831.92	5,907.76	8,382.58	9,248.24	9,091.71	8,930.03	9,513.47	9,963.75	10,855.54	11,650.64
% Change YoY ⓘ	4.7%	72.6%	20.6%	22.3%	41.9%	10.3%	(1.7%)	(1.8%)	6.5%	4.7%	9.0%	7.3%

Subject Re: Re: Re: Re: Re: benchmark yield comparison
Entry 08/29/2025 08:32 PM
Member hkup881

It's a stock exchange in an inflationary country. Revenue will do what it does based on trading volume which they have zero control over.

If inflation declines, interest rates should decline and the stock market should scream. There are a surprisingly high number of VERY high quality businesses at 2-5x EBITDA that can barely cover their debt service. Lower rates mean these companies can de-lever and then invest for growth. A rising market should attract investors and trading volumes.

I'd assume that a rising market pushes local investors out of money market accounts and into equities.

Subject Re: Re: Re: Re: Re: Re: benchmark yield comparison
Entry 08/30/2025 09:15 AM
Member beethoven

I had heard exactly what you wrote, that Lula's approval spiked and has been falling back down but when I looked into it, I found the opposite. What poll(s) were you looking at?

https://www.reuters.com/world/americas/brazils-lula-extends-comeback-approval-ticks-up-2025-08-20/?utm_source=chatgpt.com

Subject Re: Re: Re: Re: Re: Re: Re: benchmark yield comparison
Entry 09/01/2025 04:52 AM
Member hkup881

I follow a bunch of local language stuff.

Lula is back below 50 approval and he's running against nobody yet. Wait til there's a candidate with a plan. It's so bad that Lula is already talking about not running due to his health (hence the spike in Bovespa on thursday)

Subject Argentina Election Results
Entry 09/08/2025 09:39 AM
Member Rtg123

Recent Argentina election results concern you?

<https://www.dw.com/en/argentina-mileis-party-loses-key-vote-in-buenos-aires/a-73913770>

Subject Re: Argentina Election Results
Entry 09/08/2025 10:56 AM
Member beethoven

I'll jump in re: the Argentine side. This may be a good thing for Milei as he said he's going to think about the message being sent, see what can be learned and coarse correct. I think what he did "wrong" comes down to the current delay between killing inflation and restarting growth. I remember a leftist Argentine woman screaming at me a few months ago: "Milei doesn't understand Argentines! We can't take pain!" Keep in mind, Argentines are the biggest babies in the world when it comes to financial pain, whereas Icelanders are the biggest adults. Argentina has kicked the can so long to avoid pain, and now that they're actually experiencing austerity, they're crying and begging for socialism back. If Milei can kick start investment and growth, this could all pass, and his approval ratings could rebound. He's tried to preserve the balanced budget he's achieved (the first time in a long while Argentina has had one) and investment spending, such as on public works, will put them back in a deficit even though it will create a lot of jobs. This may be more of a message to Milei to end the pain already. I hope Argentines don't truly want Peronism back. I think they voted for a new direction with Milei, and pain is making some of them short-sighted. If they truly go back because they can't stand short-term pain for long-term gain, Argentina will be a basket case forever. For now, I think this was a good message to Milei. It's up to him to coarse correct.

Not sure this has implications for Brazil, but will let hkup respond.

Subject	Re: Re: Argentina Election Results
Entry	09/08/2025 05:29 PM
Member	Nails4

well, there's this whole little matter of corruption scandal.....

I had high hopes for Millei but I think he's F'ed himself.

Subject	Re: Re: Re: Argentina Election Results
Entry	09/08/2025 07:04 PM
Member	beethoven

I think the context here is important because when Lula was accused of corruption, his supporters didn't care because he presided over one of the best economies Brazil had seen at that time. Milei puts the country through severe austerity, and his sister is accused of taking bribes? Of course they want to throw rocks at him. Yesterday's vote may have been an expression of that anger rather than a desire to go backward. When the dust settles, I hope people recall 2 things. Corruption is a feature of LatAm politics. They've tried everything except this for decades hoping that somehow they'd be the only country able to escape the laws of physics and get out of crises pain-free. There's simply no other way forward. They're actually hurting themselves through their anger at Milei.

I'm going to flip around your last sentence. I had high hopes for the Argentine people. I hope they're not about to F themselves.

Subject	Horizon Kinetics
Entry	09/29/2025 01:10 PM
Member	beethoven

hkup - any insights or thoughts on the comments about exchanges on HKHC's Q2 call?

Subject	Re: Horizon Kinetics
Entry	09/29/2025 01:14 PM
Member	hkup881

Sorry, I wasn't on the call. What did HK say about exchanges??

Subject	Re: Re: Horizon Kinetics
Entry	09/29/2025 03:31 PM
Member	beethoven

"And another thing which we didn't mention in the first quarter, but we're going to mention now is we have a new private fund called Global Exchange Holdings, which we created in partnership with a Canadian company known as Urbana. Urbana is actually -- we don't talk about it much. It's very worthwhile paying attention to. If you look at their track record for almost -- not quite, almost a quarter century, you'll be hard-pressed to find a fund with a better record. So it's a really great company. We're delighted to be working with them on this project. Global Exchange Holdings is a money management proxy. It's going to buy private exchanges as well as publicly traded exchanges. Exchanges are really interesting investments themselves. I don't have time to go into why exchanges are such great investments because we here to talk about Horizon and not about exchanges. But I'll say this, as most of you probably know, I spent decades trying to convince people to be long-term investors, haven't convinced one person yet. They all want to trade. So if you buy an exchange, you're getting the benefit of that. Sorry to be a little facetious bad, but there's a lot of truth in the facetious nature of that comment. Exchanges are just fabulous businesses, high returns on equity, very stable returns on equity and a lot of free cash flow. So I have high hopes for global exchange holdings."

Subject	Re: Re: Re: Horizon Kinetics
Entry	09/29/2025 07:38 PM
Member	hkup881

I agree with him. Exchanges are great businesses. They're even better investments when a country's capital markets are bombed out, the exchange is dirt cheap, and suddenly something changes that drives trading volumes and investor interest.

I still think that Brazil will be exciting to FDI when it becomes obvious that Lula is out. I'm long B3 for that...

Subject Re: Re: Re: Re: Horizon Kinetics
Entry 09/30/2025 09:44 AM
Member beethoven

Agree. I was asking more along the lines of if their vehicle might look to acquire B3, or invest in the shares? Not sure how big their fund is, or if it's using leverage?

"It's going to buy private exchanges as well as publicly traded exchanges."

Subject Re: Re: Re: Re: Re: Horizon Kinetics
Entry 09/30/2025 10:08 AM
Member hkup881

Doubt the govt will allow a foreign firm to take over B3 for national security/pride reasons. No idea if they'll buy shares. HK owns 60k shares as of the most recent reporting, so they clearly know the name.

Subject Whatever it takes
Entry 10/03/2025 02:29 PM
Member mezzybear

I agree with the thesis and am personally very long EWZ as a macroplay. You mention the interplay of the US administration trying to get USD down at the same time when there might be a change in administration in Brazil.

I'd actually go a step further and argue that the US administration will for all intents and purposes do whatever it takes to get Lula out and a conservative candidate elected. In order to effectuate their goal of a decoupling from China, it is extremely important for them that the large commodity producers in their backyard are aligned with them and not China.

We've seen the early innings with the tariffs and sanctions (and on the other side the financial support for Argentina/Milei) and I believe they'll go much further if need be to get Lula out.

Subject Re: Whatever it takes
Entry 10/05/2025 12:17 PM
Member beethoven

I agree, and I think the financial support for Melei/Argentina could be the start of the US's "Belt and Road" initiative. Bessent said that some of the financial support, like investment by American companies into Argentina, could be contingent on Milei's party winning in the midterm elections. Trump has also invited Milei to meet with him at the White House 2 weeks before the elections, a powerful photo op. This is all to signal to the Argentine people that they can have the world's superpower backing them, or they can cry about an alleged corruption scandal and be on their own.

It will be interesting to see how the elections turn out, but I think US support may be there regardless as Milei will still be in power for another 2 years and the US will want to lock up Argentina on its side.

If investment flows into Argentina, the other LatAm countries will get the hint, and I think the US will move north with similar initiatives and ultimately try to lock up the continent of the Americas.

Subject Polymarket
Entry 12/07/2025 01:27 PM
Member beethoven

49% Lula, 39% Freitas. I realize its early, but mezzybear, you think the US will do whatever it takes. What can it do? Freitas is not well known outside of Sao Paulo and he doesn't have a captivating personality like Lula and Bolsonaro. At this point, unless there's a health issue with Lula, all else equal, we're going to get 4 more years. Thoughts?

<https://polymarket.com/event/brazil-presidential-election?tid=1765131286174>

Subject Re: Polymarket
Entry 12/07/2025 05:51 PM
Member hkup881

Almost a year to go. A lot can happen. The right doesn't even have a candidate. Bolso is posturing to get a VP position for his family. Let's see how it plays out. Think this pullback is a gift for those who wanna bet on Brazil...

Subject IB just turned on Brazil's B3 for retail clients. Institutional clients soon....
Entry 12/12/2025 10:25 AM
Member hkup881

<https://www.interactivebrokers.com/en/trading/b3-exchange-brazil.php>

Can't quantify the increase in trading volume for B3 that this will drive, but it ain't bearish...

Subject
Entry
Member
Beethoven,

Re: Polymarket
01/05/2026 05:02 PM
mezzycbear

The US has an extensive history of regime change operations worldwide, particularly throughout Latin America. While I can't predict their exact approach, there's a range of non-mutually-exclusive options they might pursue.

This could take the form of economic leverage—signaling tariffs or sanctions if Lula wins reelection, with incentives for alternative candidates. It might involve covert operations or instigating a color revolution. They could release kompromat on Lula to force his resignation, or just arrest him.

They may also employ a layered strategy: initially attempting to sway the election through subtler means, then organizing a color revolution to topple Lula if he wins regardless.

Recent events have made it abundantly clear that the Don-Roe doctrine is in full effect. Brazil is simply too significant a commodity producer for the US to allow unfettered trade with China.

P.S. It's interesting that COLO has been trading up in recent days despite the rhetoric out of the US. Feels like markets are happy to trade a bit of short-term geopolitical noise for longer term free market policies

Subject
Entry
Member

New Polling Data...
01/22/2026 02:18 PM
hkup881

Another day, and another poll. This one shows Lula losing in either scenario. Admittedly, it's CNN (fake news) and the data is 'fluid', however Brazilian equities are roaring on the news...

Lula x Flávio

CENÁRIO SEGUNDO TURNO

FLÁVIO BOLSONARO X LULA

Margem de erro: +- 2,2 p.p. | Nível de confiança: 95% | Fonte: Apex/Futura

Made with Flourish • Create a hierarchy graph

Lula x Tarcísio

CENÁRIO SEGUNDO TURNO

TARCÍSIO DE FREITAS X LULA

Margem de erro: +- 2,2 p.p. | Nível de confiança: 95% | Fonte: Apex/Futura

Made with Flourish • Create a hierarchy graph

Subject	Re: New Polling Data...
Entry	01/24/2026 12:23 PM
Member	beethoven

Curious how you see this but here's what I see, admittedly more from an Argentina lens ...

Polymarket is saying it will come down to Lula vs. Bolsonaro's son. It wouldn't be surprising to see Trump/Bessent run the same playbook as with Milei – i.e., invite Flavio to the US for photo ops and talk about how badly his father was treated by the Lula administration. For this to be effective, they need a carrot to influence Brazilians to support Flavio. Argentine markets went into a crisis when Milei's party did badly in the BA elections and Bessent stepped in with a bailout that apparently was profitable for the US. Brazil is not in crisis. IMO, the best way to show what aligning with the US means is by MArgGA. They need to show Argentina racing forward due to its alignment with the US. The poor in Brazil will always vote for Lula because he's one of them (or he was), but they'll abandon him if they see Argentina rising due to US backing. The administration needs to get going and show tangible results in Argentina because it doesn't hold the same "we're your savior and if we walk away, enjoy yet another crisis" cards in Brazil.

<https://polymarket.com/event/which-candidates-will-advance-to-brazils-presidential-runoff>

Subject	Re: Re: New Polling Data...
Entry	01/24/2026 10:28 PM

Member hkup881

The polling is saying that Lula may lose without the US pushing. That's a big change.

With Trump, it's impossible to know what the plan is (or if there even is one). Though he does seem to have a soft spot for Bolsonaro. Argentina, should keep improving organically, though a push by Trump would obviously help.

At the same time, it seems as though the interest rates cycle is turning supportive of equities. As a friend put it, even if Lula wins, the floor just stepped up with rates declining and BRL stable.

Still a long time until the election...

Subject	Re: Re: Re: New Polling Data...
Entry	04/15/2026 10:25 AM
Member	hkup881

Polymarket now has little Bozo ahead of Lula. Still a lot of time left until elections, but the trend is certainly in our favor and follows the trend towards other pro-growth candidates winning throughout South America...

Log In

Sign Up

Trending Breaking New Politics Sports Crypto

World · Brazil

Brazil Presidential Election

- Flávio Bolsonaro 41.3%
- Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva 39%
- Renan Santos 6.5%
- Fernando Haddad 4.7%

🛡️ $50,775,947 Vol.

1H 1D 1W 1M MAX ⚙️

Flávio Bolsonaro

$4,076,796 Vol.

41%